Director Doris Jakubec. %% Meizoz considers the representation of popular speech in the novels of the Thirties from a literary and sociolinguistic point of view. It is a question of showing that Céline was far from being the first to use a form of narrative discourse written to reflect the oral, but Meizoz also shows that a political context and a whole sociolinguistic context (influenced especially by an argument between grammarians and linguists) favored the emergence of various forms of oral narration. This was very early in the case of Ramuz (starting in about 1920) but also appeared in Giono (from 1929 on), Cendrars (1929), Poulaille (1931), Queneau (1933), or even Aragon (1936).

Genève: Droz, 2001, pp. 421-462. %% In this chapter from his book, Meizoz works in two sections. The first (pp. 421-439) concentrates on locating Queneau in his petit-bourgeois background and all that that would mean for his grounding in language and then details how he became aware of other sorts of French through experience and reading certain theorists. Meizoz also points to various attempts to write in a "popular" style which Queneau would have been aware of. Through all of this, he opens the question of what Queneau might have thought about the "common man" in terms of language and in terms of politics, which he indirectly suggests are two very different things. This section is quite detailed and enlightening.

The second section (pp. 441-462) applies these ideas to Le Chiendent by enumerating the different manners in which Queneau uses language not only as part of the text but as part of the plot. Also quite interesting, although in a different fashion and for different reasons.
